

Petit Roubié (organic) Picpoul de Pinet (CA sales only)

Olivier and Floriane Azan bought Petit Roubié in 1981 and converted to organic farming in 1995. Today, surprisingly enough, Petit Roubié is still the only certified organic domaine in the Picpoul de Pinet appellation. The Azans farm 200 acres of vines, all of which are harvested at night to preserve acidity in the grapes. The vineyard parcels are broken down among grapes destined for such vin de pays wines as Cabernet Sauvignon, Syrah, Tannat, Carignan and Sauvignon Blanc. Their most important production, however, is Picpoul.

The village of Pinet lies within a mile of the Via Domitia—the original Roman thoroughfare connecting Spain to the Rhône Valley and subsequently Italy—and was probably a villa during the Roman Occupation. The village lies between the modern day autoroute and the Bassin de Thau, a lagoon of the Mediterranean that is famous nowadays for its mussel and oyster farms, and which is commanded by the holiday and fishing town of Sète. In 1946 Picpoul de Pinet was classed as a VDQS and got its AOC status in 1985. It's one of the few French AOCs to promote a varietally named wine.

Picpoul is an ancient Mediterranean grape, with versions in noir and gris, but it is the white that excels. Prized for acidity, body, and flavor, it has become known as the Muscadet of the Languedoc because of the vines' proximity to the sea and the wine's association with the local seafood. In Occitan, the name translates as lip-stinger, or pecking hens, both referring to its biting qualities (especially biting when yields are too high). In the sunny south, a white grape that is able to ripen while retaining acidity is uncommon, and one that can do so with flavor is downright rare. Combine that with a domaine that farms organically, and you have the rarest of the rare. As for the name, 'small roubié' is the name of the land the domaine occupies. Les vieux du village (the village elders) think Roubié may have been the name of an ancient proprietor.

<http://www.petit-roubie.com/>